Social Network offers Virtual Assistants A Place to Connect

VAVillage.com opens its doors to Virtual Assistants around the globe for free networking and resource sharing.

Since businesses learned that they could outsource work such as accounting, transcription, billing and more to contractors that would come to their office and pick up work and deliver a finished product the virtual assistant business has been thriving.

Before the internet allowed virtual assistants to work from home, the weekly or daily pick-up and delivery of work allowed virtual assistants to talk with their clients and catch up with the ladies in the office. Now, virtual assistants offer services such as project management, sales, graphic design and more, but they do it while rarely ever meeting their clients face to face.

One network, VA Village, has recently launched a networking site where virtual assistants of any specialty can connect with one another.

Jerri Palumbo, owner of Virtually Achieved and founder of VA Village stated, "It is important for professionals that work from home to have a place where they can connect and network with others in their field. Not only does it offer an opportunity to share ideas, talk about ways to find work or manage clients and how to handle certain specialties such as writing, graphic design, etc., it also offers an opportunity to talk about life outside of work. Sometimes it is tough being so virtual and my hope is that VA Village will allow virtual assistants of every specialty to join our free community and feel connected."

With thousands of virtual assistants working from home and more joining the profession every month, many of them find themselves feeling cut off from people who understand their way of life.

"Being a virtual assistant without connections outside of your clients can be difficult for various reasons. The biggest complaint many VAs have is that their husband or friends don't know what it is like to work from home or why you talk their ear off the minute you speak to them in person or on the phone. Everyone needs interaction with someone who understands what you do for a living and why you do it. VA Village is perhaps the best resource I have found where I can connect with other virtual assistants and talk about work or life and they get what I am saying," stated Marissa Convoy a member of VA Village.
